Information on the population conditions that affect evaluations by community health needs assessment agencies (CHNAs) and effects on their evaluation of health needs is lacking. This study is an analysis of patients who receive medications and those who receive botulinum toxin for facial muscle relaxation. The primary study was a retrospective cohort study of administrative data obtained during a 5-year period from four medical groups. The final research sample consisted of 3,864 patients for medications and 1,919 for botulinum toxin. Patient characteristics affecting assessments by CHNAs for health needs for medication patients included age, gender, health risk index, and presence of frequent symptoms. Clinical characteristics affecting assessments for botulinum toxin patients included age, severity, duration of treatment, and presence of frequent symptoms. Regression models controlling for patient characteristics were used to predict the impact of differences in population characteristics on the assessment of health needs.
