YouTube to blame for your cat's obsessive compulsive disorder Your cat is an expert at staring at the new toy you got for her, even if she's never played with it before. YouTube is to blame for your feline friend's OCD, researchers say. According to a study released Monday, videos on the video-sharing website play a key role in the development of obsessive compulsive disorders in cats. The study found that, contrary to popular belief, cats are more likely to be fastidious when given free rein to indulge their appetites. "Our study shows that cats are obsessive like humans," said Dr. Patrick Grady, a senior author of the study and a behavioral medicine specialist at the University of California, Davis. "The study also shows that cat owners often use YouTube as a tool to explore the most effective methods to 'fix' or calm feline compulsions.” Researchers looked at the behavior of 648 cats in 70 households using a screening test to assess OCD. They found that 42 percent of cats in the study were considered to have obsessive compulsive disorders. Of those, 73 percent had video-based playpens, which are essentially interactive toy structures available on YouTube. One of the most striking revelations of the study was that videos were the top reason cats became hoarders. When they watched videos, researchers found they focused on objects, including accessories, that were placed in front of the camera. It was as if the cats were taking the video as an example of “this is how you do it” with some of the mechanisms being taught on YouTube, said Dr. T. Ruby Miller, a co-author and animal behavior specialist at the University of California, Davis. “It’s interesting that we found the websites to be the best resource for information,” said Dr. Greg Nasca, a co-author and a clinical animal behavior specialist at the Cummings School of Veterinary Medicine at Tufts University in Massachusetts. Researchers said there was no effect on their findings when they excluded videos from the Internet, such as on a laptop. When they captured videos of their cats, researchers discovered that only certain videos or types of videos were preferable to others. Cats seemed to like videos of people demonstrating a variety of exercises such as spinning their pets on a finger, but not videos of intense clicking sounds.
