Some dogs are pretty persistent when it comes to scratching, gnawing, or licking an area that's bothering them. If your furry pal insists on licking the spot where you applied hydrocortisone cream, it may cause some mild symptoms, says Butzer, including: Treatment of atrophic vaginitis involves the use of topical oestrogen if vulvitis is the only problem. If the patient is experiencing systemic symptoms, hormone replacement therapy is required. Oestrogen creams or pessaries are initially used daily for two weeks then once or twice a week depending on response. There should be an improvement within a month, and if not an alternative diagnosis should be considered. Where there is a concurrent dermatitis, 1% hydrocortisone ointment should be used daily with a lubricating emollient and a soap substitute. Stronger topical corticosteroids will worsen the atrophy and should be avoided. An oestrogen pessary will be preferable as cream may cause burning where dermatitis is present. Which Type of Product Is Best?You will notice that hydrocortisone is available in several forms, such as creams, ointments, sprays, and lotions. The choice is personal, as all products are effective. Creams have a smooth feel that some patients prefer, whereas ointments cover the skin with a greasy or oily layer of active ingredient. Ointments are more resistant to water removal, such as when one later washes the hands. Lotions spread over the skin more smoothly than creams or ointments but are also subject to water removal. Sprays allow the user to cover the area without rubbing a product on. This is an advantage when rubbing or touching the affected area causes itching or pain.
