There are some basics that set a foundation for the rest how to ship products to your customers. While you can come back and change each of these later on, as you learn more, these are the key decisions and steps that make up your high-level shipping strategy. To streamline the process of shipping ecommerce orders, measure and update the weight of each product you sell. Having this information about your ecommerce shipments set up will help you get a good sense of your total costs, and pass along accurate prices to your customers. Offering your customers free shipping is one of the best ways to reduce shopping cart abandonment. However, as you might suspect, shipping is never free. Someone always has to pay. To make free shipping work, you have a few options. Another effective shipping strategy is to charge real-time carrier rates for shipping. If you're using Shopify as your ecommerce platform, you can use Shopify's ecommerce shipping integrations that work in real-time with various carriers like USPS and Canada Post (among others) to generate shipping options and live pricing from various carriers. This allows your customers to choose and pay for the exact service they want. A popular option is to offer flat rate shipping. The best practice for this option is to try and make sure that you don't drastically undercharge or overcharge your customers. Flat rate shipping works best when you have a fairly standard product line of items that have similar sizes and weights. Flat rate shipping tends to become complicated and less effective if you sell a wide variety of products with different sizes and weights. As the world of ecommerce develops so do the expectations of customers who buy online. Years ago, packaging and shipping was simply a way to receive a product purchased online, but more and more people are looking for shipping, packaging and presentation as part of the ecommerce experience. Because the cost of most shipping options is based on size and/or weight, do your best to keep your packaging as small as possible. This will not only help you save on your ecommerce shipping rates and what your customer paid for shipping, but will also keep packaging costs from eating away your profit margin. Boost customer satisfaction while driving sales growth for your ecommerce business with an effective shipping and fulfillment strategy. Use this guide to create a plan that covers all aspects of shipping and fulfillment, from how much to charge your customers to choosing the right fulfillment method. Consider purchasing insurance on big-ticket items so that, in the rare cases when a package does get lost, you'll be covered. Keep in mind that some shipping services have insurance already built into the price, so consider this when you are comparing various courier prices. Once you have decided on the carriers you want to use, consider setting up business accounts. Business accounts offer a variety of services including discounts, better expense tracking, and a whole host of online tools to more efficiently manage the shipping aspects of your business. Fulfillment services and warehouses can help automate and handle the shipping for you. When you choose to work with a fulfillment center, you will store your inventory at one of their warehouses. Depending on their level of integration with your shopping cart, when an order comes in your fulfillment partner will automatically be forwarded the order to pick, pack, and ship orders on your behalf. Once you get an order in your Shopify online store, log into your Shopify dashboard to access your shipping label. This will include all pertinent information for your customer, including name and mailing address. Here's the bottom line: figuring out how to ship products to customers is a challenging aspect for any online product-based business. Every business will have their own unique challenges they need to work through and overcome to develop the best and most efficient ecommerce shipping solutions. Like many aspects of building your new ecommerce site, it will take time and tweaking to determine what works best. Prices, specifications, availability and terms of offers may change without notice.
